The money is leaking after the lead comes in

None of these losses feels big when it happens.

A missed call. An empty appointment. An upsell nobody offered. A customer nobody followed up with. A little admin work here and there.

Together, they become $4,363,950 a year.

Most home-service businesses aren't losing money because they lack customers. They're losing it because the system they're running has holes in it — and those holes have become so routine, they've stopped being noticed.

The phone rings after hours. Nobody answers. The customer moves on. A job gets booked, the truck shows up, and the customer doesn't. The technician finishes, shakes hands, walks out — and never mentions the maintenance plan, the upgrade, or the next service.

None of this feels dramatic. But at scale, it quietly bleeds thousands of dollars a month out of businesses that are otherwise running well. This report breaks down exactly where that money is going — and what it's worth to stop the leak.

03 Five places revenue walks out

Missed Calls

Roughly 35% of inbound calls go unanswered during peak hours, after hours, and overflow moments. Each missed call is a $3,500 job that never enters the schedule — and often books with a competitor instead.

624Voice answers every call around the clock, qualifies the job, and books the appointment so revenue does not depend on who is at the desk.

No-Shows

About 10% of booked appointments no-show, leaving trucks and time slots empty. Every no-show burns a dispatch slot and the marketing cost that created the lead — with $3,500 jobs at stake per missed visit.

Automated SMS confirmations and reminders cut no-shows before the truck rolls, protecting booked capacity.

Upsell Revenue Left on the Table

Technicians finish the visit without offering maintenance plans, upgrades, or the next service while trust is highest. Post-job follow-up captures $750 add-on revenue that would otherwise walk out the door after every completed job.

624Voice triggers post-job sequences while the experience is fresh, prompting customers to accept offers your team already earned the right to make.

A Customer List You're Not Using

Past customers sit dormant even though you already paid to acquire them. Proactive SMS campaigns turn that list into $3,500 repeat and seasonal jobs without new ad spend.

624Voice runs seasonal reminders, maintenance prompts, and win-back messages so existing customers hear from you first.

Your Time

Scheduling, confirming, rescheduling, and logging calls consume admin hours every week. Manual coordination costs $75 per hour in leadership and office time that never reaches the revenue line.

624Voice automates routine call handling and follow-up so your team spends time running the business, not chasing the phone.
